In America, marriage bonds took the place of marriage licenses, having been required at least as early as the 1660s. The idea was to prevent illegal marriages (if, for example, one were already married or underage) by making people who knew the affianced couple pay out a large amount of money that would be forfeit if they failed to disclose an objection before the marriage took place.

Through the millenia, we have called powerful women many things—bitches, witches, regents, seductresses. And we have demanded that women relinquish their sexuality to assume authority, including the God's Wives of Amen of the Twenty-Fifth and Twenty-Sixth Dynasties, vestal virgins of ancient Rome, Catholic nuns, and countless women of the 1970s and '80s in business or government or academia.
